Q: Execute system commands with PHP without returning I'm writing a PHP CLI script which generates some output and wants to send it to a file that's being written to by another process. Currently I'm using the following in my script:

This works but I'm trying to achieve a more robust solution. I've read (on various posts) that I can use `popen`, or `shell_exec`, etc. If I use one of these methods, how do I send my output to the file I'm writing to without having my script execute completely before writing to the file, so that I can still view my output in the screen? I just want the output to be written to the file without the rest of the script returning to the caller. A: try `exec("stuff > file.txt");` or `exec("nohup stuff > file.txt &");` the `&` after the command will tell the shell to run the command and then be left alone if you want more from that i'd suggest reading up on "signals" (SIGQUIT, SIGUSR1, SIGUSR2 and SIGTERM) and implementing something like this Eggshells and the Like: Eggs during Santería: A Case Study of Culturally-Specific Power and Expertise in Santeria. People in the Western world often view eggs as "one of the last vestiges of the animalistic." However, the role eggs play in the religion of Santería (or Santería religion) is much more complex. Eggs are sources of power and an integral part of the religious culture of the Yoruba people that follow this religion. From the moment an ova reaches the matuzé (a person who is the master of the egg) until its consumption by the person, the powerful spirit of the egg is believed to be "out of control." This paper examines this issue of power and the role of eggshells in the spiritual domains of Santería in the Western world and specifically examines how the Santería community might approach the use of eggs during
